narrative in fiction its varieties and the place it occupies between the reader and the imaginary world of the novel most easily if I translate a psychological fact into a physical metaphor and say that the reader is divided from the imaginary world of the novel by a high wall over which he cannot see On the top of the wall is perched the novelist He looks down into the world of his imagination and then turns to the reader and tells him what is going on there The novelist does not like the dramatist pick up bits of his world and set them down on the near side of the wall for actors to animate and his audience to see the novelist
