Uncertainty has grown considerably after the end of the Cold War In the place of one big threat a plenitude of many smaller and more incalculable risks superseded New dangers have emerged or become more salient as compared to former times like environmental issues IT problems or economic crises while old ones have not entirely vanished The risks emanating from WMDs or the threat of wars remain existent albeit sometimes in an altered form Several factors have contributed to the alteration of the threat and risk pattern in the main the transition to a multipolar world order the processes of globalization and last but not least the diminishing importance of borders and of the sovereign nation state as such are decisive Hence the vulnerability of civil society has increased considerably as open societies are more risk prone In reaction to these developments academics and politicians have refined the traditional concept of national security into a broader notion considering a multitude of aspects affecting the safety of the human being as such In consequence the classical security architecture is being adapted bit by bit to the conditions of the 21st century On each level i e the national regional as well as international layers diverse mechanisms have been developed as exemplary illustrated with reference to the transnational danger of terrorism
