Benchmarking is about collecting information and data of your own company and your reference groups. To avoid comparing apples to bananas, it is important to establish clear definitions of the metrics and business capabilities you are benchmarking. Once you feel you have all the information you can gather, you can properly analyze the data. It is important to remember that no business is perfect, and you can only learn from an open and objective analysis. This requires an open and unbiased mindset. Ideally, you involve a broad set of (internal and/or external) experience, backgrounds, and expertise in the analysis. Once findings start to be uncovered, you can prepare reports.
