Structure and Dynamics of the Pacific Upper Mantle Rafael Katzman, 1998 A new tomographic technique is employed to investigate the structure and dynamics of the Pacific upper mantle We invert frequency dependent travel times residuals of three component turning and surface waves such as S SS SSS R1 and G1 together with band center travel times of ScS reverberations for the 2D composite structure in the plane of two Pacific corridors The model parameters include shear speed variations throughout the mantle perturbations to radial shear wave anisotropy in the uppermost mantle and the topography of the 410 and 660 discontinuities The image for the first corridor between Tonga and Oahu Hawaii reveals a harmonic pattern of highs and lows having an upper mantle thickness a horizontal wavelength of 1500 km and an amplitude of 3% High shear velocities underlie each of three northwest trending geoid swells downstream from the major hotspots of the Society Marquesas and Hawaiian Islands The result along the second corridor from Oahu and Ryukyu also exhibits a prominent fast region that extends beneath the entire Hawaiian swell down to depth of 200 300 km It is therefore implied that the topography of the swells in the central Pacific is supported by a chemical buoyancy mechanism and not by thermal buoyancy Upper mantle convective rolls may account for the depth extent of the fast anomalies beneath the swells
