Digital Capitalism Networking The Global Market System:

Digital Capitalism Dan Schiller, 2000 Schiller traces the transformation of the Internet from government military and educational tool to agent of digital capitalism through three critically important and interlinked realms The networks that comprise cyberspace were originally created at the behest of government agencies military contractors and allied educational institutions Over the past generation or so however a growing number of these networks began to serve primarily corporate users Under the sway of an expansionary market logic the Internet began a political economic transition toward what Dan Schiller calls digital capitalism Schiller traces these metamorphoses through three critically important and interlinked realms Parts I and II deal with the overwhelmingly neoliberal or market driven policies that influence and govern the telecommunications system and their empowerment of transnational corporations while at the same time exacerbating existing social inequalities Part III shows how cyberspace offers uniquely supple instruments with which to cultivate and deepen consumerism on a transnational scale especially among privileged groups Finally Part IV shows how digital capitalism has already overtaken education placing it at the mercy of a proprietary market logic

Cultural Moves Herman Gray,2005-02-14 Herman Gray takes a sweeping look at black popular culture over the past decade to explore culture s role in the push for black political power and social recognition In a series of linked essays he finds that black artists scholars musicians and others have been instrumental in reconfiguring social and cultural life in the United States and he provocatively asks how black culture can now move beyond a preoccupation with inclusion and representation Gray considers how Wynton Marsalis and his creation of a jazz canon at Lincoln Center acted to establish cultural visibility and legitimacy for jazz Other essays address such topics as the work of the controversial artist Kara Walker the relentless struggles for representation on network television when those networks are no longer the primary site of black or any other identity and how black musicians such as Steve Coleman and George Lewis are using new technology to shape and extend black musical traditions and cultural identities
