

Background

The Palace Tables is the world's largest building made of rammed ear-earth. With exhibiting and preserving traditional ear-earth construction techniques, the Taping Tables also inherits the essence of traditional Chinese culture and is a testimony to the cultural wisdom of living together as a community. It creates a unique experience of the art of ear-earth architecture. The Tables is a self-contained, economical, environmentally friendly, durable, decorative and light-colored type of ear-earth high-rise building that flexibly uses the support for part of the structure and local building materials such as ear-earth, bricks and pebbles.

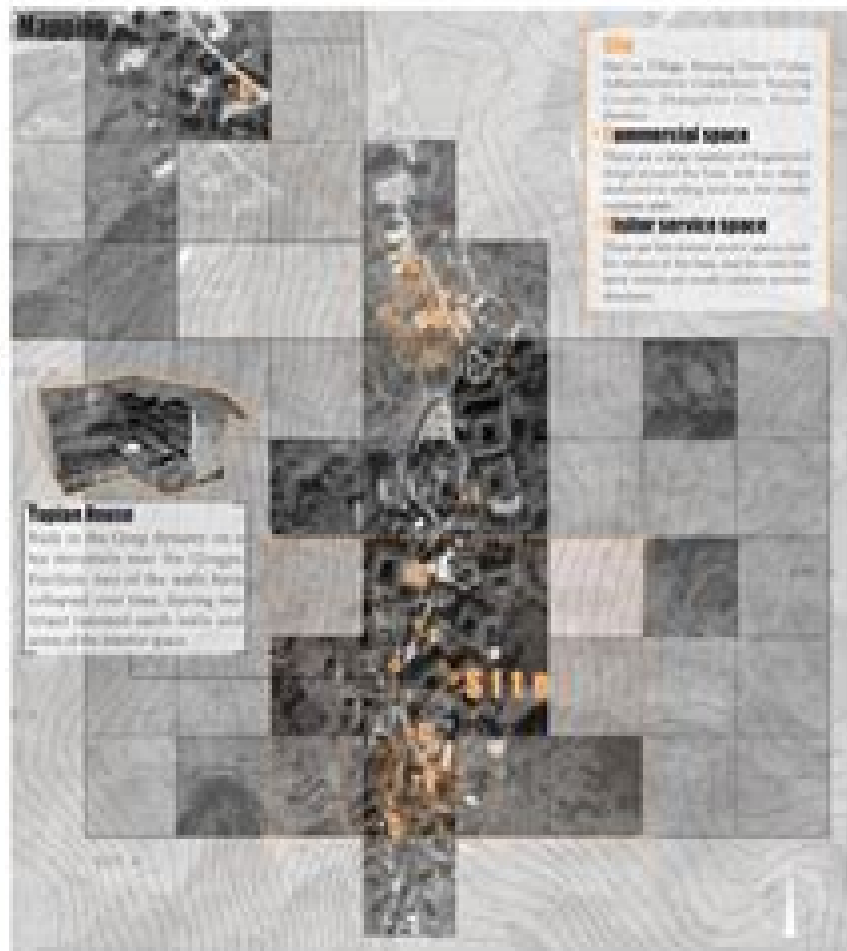

The people of Haining local residents become the Muslim and Christian people, converging and the original spirit, around light between function, engaging three and three elements that reflect the structure.

In order to survive, the people of Haining built ear-earth buildings with both residential and defense functions along with the different geographical environment of the area. The structural approach is a combination of increasing the outer walls with ear-earth and building the water flow inside the building.

In 1988, Japan Tables was listed as a UNESCO World Heritage Site. The Palace Tables is a unique architectural achievement in the world for its large scale rammed earth construction, which is of national and pioneering value.

Many of these buildings are no longer inhabited, and some have begun to collapse due to the deterioration of mortar. The number of old citizens who know the art of building and repairing tables is dwindling and there is not time to bring the world heritage site
