

newer immigrant neighbors moving in. The church didn't know how to connect with these neighbors across differences of race and culture, to say nothing of neighbors in nearby areas across differences of class.

Deborah was pastor of a midsized congregation that had survived the pandemic mostly intact but not without cost. Her leadership team had moved the congregation's worship and activities online as best they could, and most members remained connected. Yet Deborah and the other leaders were worn out. Even before the pandemic, she had struggled to keep the "machine" of the congregation's activities and programs running. Doing it while negotiating conflicting pandemic health and safety expectations and trying to keep everything and everyone together brought Deborah to the brink of utter exhaustion. She was thinking seriously about leaving the ministry. At the same time, Deborah had discovered a group of amazing women through her neighborhood yoga studio. They would sometimes linger after class to share stories, and many were opening up about their spiritual struggles. None of them were part of a church, and Deborah realized there was little in the congregation she served that would make sense to them. Deborah was caught between wanting to go deeper in relationship with these women and physically having to pull herself away from conversations with them to get back to managing the church.
