Global Citizenship Key Concepts and Their Overlaps with Critical Language Pedagogy

In critical pedagogy and applied research published in English, there has been an increasing emphasis on citizenship education (Osler & Starkey, 2018), and particularly global citizenship, over the past decades (Enslin, 2011, p. 91; Myers, 2006, 2010; Gaudelli, 2009). A number of studies (e.g. Oxley & Morris, 2013; Marshall, 2005, 2007) testify that the term global citizenship has been undergoing discursive drift (Cameron, 1995) (for a specific example, see Oxley & Morris, 2013, p. 301). Another, related, concept which is rendered ambiguous both within and across contexts is cosmopolitanism. Used in some contexts in a way which leaves moral considerations entirely out of focus, cosmopolitanism is defined by some theoreticians, particularly in educational contexts, in a way which places emphasis precisely on that. Veugelers (2011, p. 475) illustrates the first of these approaches with the image of the wealthy globe trotter, who, “elevated out of the territorial community, [...] enjoys the pleasant sides of cultural diversity”, often adopted in commercials, international media and marketing (cf. Bauman, 1998; Roman, 2004). An elitist underlay is also detectable in Waks’s (2008, p. 204) aesthetic-cultural cosmopolitanism, characterized by “a kind of multi-national sophistication” and openness towards “those from other places”, studied through travel, reading and personal contact. De Ruyter and Spiecker (2008, pp. 354–359) take this approach further through their peculiar definition of cultural competence, which, for them, involves the individual’s active contribution to the cultural flourishing of a “genre-rich”, or multi-cultural, society. The underlying assumption that the “culturally competent” “world citizen” has the intellectual, economic, and motivational means to access various cultures has been critiqued for its class-based elitism and for its associations with the Nietzschean übermensch (for an overview see Oxley & Morris, 2013, p. 311).

The second understanding of cosmopolitanism is different inasmuch as it places humanitarian moral values front and centre in its framework. Nussbaum (1997), and more recently Appiah (2008), provided
