

SM750: Introduction to Social Medicine and Global Health Harvard Medical School, Fall 2013

Paul Farmer, David Jones, and Jen Kasper, Course Directors

Social, economic, and political forces powerfully influence who gets sick, what diseases afflict them, which treatments are available, and the outcomes of those treatments. Why else does heart disease persist as the world's leading cause of death, even though the measures needed to prevent it have been known for over fifty years? Why else are outcomes of HIV infection so different in different countries, and why do they vary widely even within the United States?

All physicians encounter such questions in their clinical work, whether they work in Boston, elsewhere in the United States or further afield. These questions cannot be answered by studying molecular biology and pathophysiology alone. Medical education and practice must be grounded in an understanding of social medicine, a field of inquiry that uses the methods of the social sciences and the humanities to analyze disease and medicine.

This course will introduce students to the theory and practice of social medicine to enable them to recognize these forces wherever they work, to understand how they affect their patients, and to develop appropriate responses. Lectures and tutorials will explore (1) the determinants of disease and health inequalities between populations and
