

Case Formulation in Psychiatry

Topic: Health & Medicine | Words: 606 | Pages: 2

Case formulation allows doctors, nurse practitioners, and nurses to see each patient's unique story that led to their psychological breakdown. Nurse practitioners peer into the behavior of the patient and notice different details. Case formulation also takes into account the details of each patient's past and teaches nurse practitioners to analyze why a mental disorder has manifested itself. Nurse practitioners pay close attention to detail, consult with each other, and learn to think globally by juxtaposing the facts and developing critical thinking. The scenario of treatment in such situations can differ from those already familiar, which, however, requires increased concentration and a large-scale background of knowledge from nurses. In addition, case formulation allows nurse practitioners to be culturally sensitive and treat patients with respect for their personal experiences. Case formulation expands the understanding of mental illness and allows for the active accumulation of medical experience using extraordinary examples. This method pays particular attention to the behavioral characteristics of people, their already-formed habits, and interpersonal communication.

In addition to being helpful in making a correct diagnosis, case formulation has a noticeable humanistic foundation. This method allows some patients to get rid of the stigma, especially patients whose psychological problems were caused by strong external stress. Such patients are usually afraid that their colleagues, friends, neighbors, and relatives will find out about their diagnosis. Modern society has not yet gotten rid of the stigma against people suffering from mental disorders. Because of this, psychiatrists can harm the patient by trying to help and doing only their job. Johnstone (2017) states, "Psychiatry is facing a
