Amazonia: Landscape and Species Evolution Carina Hoorn, Frank Wesselingh, 2011-09-26 The book focuses on geological history as the critical factor in determining the present biodiversity and landscapes of Amazonia The different driving mechanisms for landscape evolution are explored by reviewing the history of the Amazonian Craton the associated sedimentary basins and the role of mountain uplift and climate change This book provides an insight into the Meso and Cenozoic record of Amazonia that was characterized by fluvial and long lived lake systems and a highly diverse flora and fauna This fauna includes giants such as the ca 12 m long caiman Purussaurus but also a varied fish fauna and fragile molluscs whilst fossil pollen and spores form relics of ancestral swamps and rainforests Finally a review the molecular datasets of the modern Amazonian rainforest and aquatic ecosystem discussing the possible relations between the origin of Amazonian species diversity and the palaeogeographic palaeoclimatic and palaeoenvironmental evolution of northern South America The multidisciplinary approach in evaluating the history of Amazonia has resulted in a comprehensive volume that provides novel insights into the evolution of this region Integrating Landscape Ecology Into Natural Resource Management Jianguo Liu, William W. Evaluating Indices that Measure Departure of Current Landscape Composition from Historical Conditions Robert E. Keane, 2011 A measure of the degree of departure of a landscape from its range of historical conditions can provide a means for prioritizing and planning areas for restoration treatments There are few statistics or indices that provide a quantitative context for measuring departure across landscapes This study evaluated a set of five similarity indices commonly used in vegetation community ecology Sorenson's Index Chord Distance Morisita's Index Euclidean Distance and Similarity Ratio for application in estimating landscape departure where departure = 1 similarity This involved comparing composition vegetation type by area of a set of reference landscapes to the compositions of 1 000 simulated historical landscapes Stochastic simulation modeling was used to create a diverse set of synthetic reference and historical landscapes for departure index evaluation Five reference landscapes were created to represent various degrees of expected departure from historical conditions Both reference and historical landscapes were created to contain four important factors that could potentially influence departure calculation 1 number of classes defining landscape composition 2 dominance of the classes 3 variability of area with the classes and 4 temporal autocorrelation We found that most evaluated indices are useful but not optimal for calculating departure The Sorenson s Index appeared to perform the best with consistent and precise behavior across the ranges of the four treatments The number of classes used to describe vegetation had the strongest influence on index performance landscape composition defined by few classes had the least accurate most imprecise and most highly variable departure estimates While results from this study show the utility of similarity indices in evaluating departure it is also evident that a new set of statistics are needed to provide a more comprehensive analysis of departure for future applications
