Abolishing the Domains:The Meiji government started by abolishing the domains of the daimyo, who were feudal lords. Over three years, the daimyo were persuaded to give up their lands, which laid the groundwork for Japan's agrarian and political unity.

Transition to Prefectures:By 1870, this process was complete, and all daimyo became Governors of their former domains while still maintaining control. In August 1871, the Emperor formally abolished all domains, consolidating them into 72 prefectures with governors appointed centrally.

Financial Settlement:A financial agreement was reached, where the daimyo received a yearly salary, about 10% of their former annual tax collection. The government also took on the daimyo's debts and liabilities towards the samurai, paying them a pension as well.

Financial Burden and Solutions:Paying pensions to the daimyo and samurai strained the new government's finances. In 1873, the government announced that stipends would be taxed, and samurai were given the option to convert their stipends into government bonds with interest.

Forced Commutation:By 1876, the government enforced the conversion of all feudal pensions into bonds. This helped secure funds for industrialization and militarization while gaining support from the politically discontented classes. However, it negatively affected the samurai, leading to a significant drop in income, partly due to fiscal mismanagement.
