

Systems of Judgment of Architectural Design

A Research Project Proposed
By Sami Hassid, * Associate Professor of Architecture
College of Environmental Design, University of California (Berkeley)

INTRODUCTION

This project represents an empirical approach to understanding the processes and principles governing the judgment of architectural design and their relation to their counterparts governing creative decisions. It is a phase of a research program on "Systems of Judgment of Architectural Design."

STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM

One of the main conditions for the appreciation and judgment of an architectural work is an awareness of the process of its creation. Haziness surrounds at present the understanding of creative as well as evaluative processes and principles of architectural design. The relation between the two sets of processes and principles is even less well understood. The possibility of building a bridge between the two sets is conjectural. However, the resolution of this problem is important. In all these matters, research is needed to improve the understanding of, and hence the ability to judge, architectural works of art.

The problem proposed for investigation in this project is the correlation between the processes and principles governing design decisions on the one hand, and, on the other hand, those governing the critical evaluation of architectural works.

JUSTIFICATION OF THE PROJECT

Need for Criticism and Research in Architecture

The realization of the need for criticism in architecture has been steadily increasing. Recent literature abounds with calls for a basis for architectural criticism, or for a frame of reference on which such criticism can be based⁽¹⁾.  The dearth of trained critics of architecture is noticeable⁽²⁾ and the lack of accepted criteria for criticism is deplorable⁽³⁾. Terms used in architectural criticism are characterized mainly by their
