The Growth of Active Adult Age-restricted Retirement Communities in Connecticut Tom Brodnitzki, 2008 The traditional definition of retirement and retirement migration is changing in the United States This change in retirement is being fueled by the baby boomer generation Historically retirement migration has led retirees to move to warmer destinations to live out their remaining years However this trend spurred on baby boomers desire to do things differently from previous generations is changing as new local retirement migration destinations become available Active adult age restricted retirement communities have grown in the state of Connecticut as a non traditional retirement destination Connecticut s population has a higher percentage of baby boomers than the national figure These figures suggest the potential for a rise in the development of a new retirement alternative Towns around the state must consider if the development of these new communities is a positive economic development option Rocky Hill Connecticut has seen eight such communities built in recent years and has illustrated conclusions through revisions to the Planning and Zoning Regulations that their community may be saturated with this type of development Other towns around the state and in the region can look to the example of Rocky Hill to determine if they wish to promote the development of active adult age restricted retirement communities From Sun Cities to the Villages Judith Ann Trolander, 2012-12-15 Youngtown Arizona opened in 1954 and was the first development community to have a minimum age requirement then 65 and to ban underage children as permanent residents The developer Del Webb unveiled Sun City six years later Adjacent to Yountown it offered modest homes abutting a golf course In the ensuing decades active adult communities have proliferated including Harold Schwartz s The Villages in central Florida today America s largest retirement community For nearly sixty years the success of these and similar communities has changed the image of retirees from frail impoverished old people to energetic well off adults enjoying a resort like lifestyle While some experts predicted these communities would fail or undermine the obligations between generations they are now firmly embedded as one possible extension of the American Dream Judith Ann Trolander s study of the active adult lifestyle focuses specifically on how the development of age restricted communities has redefined the sense of self identity among the elderly changed the popular image of retirees called attention to attitudes of the elderly toward children popularized golf course gated and amenity rich developments and made this new age restricted lifestyle affordable or accessible to large numbers of retirees some of whom may actually continue working Examining the origins development failures and challenges facing these communities as the baby boomer population continues to age Trolander offers a truly original defense of a sometimes controversial aspect of American life Book cover Annual Meeting Proceedings American Society of Landscape Architects.
