

elect the first consuls? But one may assume that it was Republican magistrates—in contrast to the kings—who needed investiture by the Comitia curiata, granting formally but limiting their annual term of office. The Comitia curiata, Magdelain holds, operated before the Comitia centuriata and Comitia tributa took their historical place. From the mid fifth century he sees two stages of appointment: first election, then investiture by the Lex curiata.

Magdelain now comes to the auspicia in the light of their importance in the exercise of imperium. The evidence is largely familiar. He discusses such topics as the origin of imperium, the dictatorship, the auspices of the Comitia centuriata, the censors and lustrum, and the changing position of promagistrates, as well as personal examples, e.g., Flaminius, Scipio Africanus in Spain, Ti. Sempronius Gracchus in 163 B.C. All familiar enough, but no less difficult and contentious for that. How does one allow for the kind of evidence itself, then the various dates and circumstances of the cases? Magdelain looks for the ritual logic of the auspicia. I have mentioned topics of interest—but his treatment must be studied as a coherent piece of argumentation.

The context, then, casts back to the basic significance of the auspicia. A Republican magistrate entering on office, a general departing for his province, the victorious general returning to celebrate a triumph, had to proceed with due augural ceremony. For within the pomerium, as Magdelain emphasizes, Rome was Jupiter's city, founded and governed with ritual; Mars and his works stayed outside, with their ritual. This was not (he holds) a Republican division of an earlier unitary imperium: it represented a sacral duality of civil and military imperium, i.e. domi and militiae, from regal times; also, it had a topographical relation with the conception of urbs and ager Romanus. The urbs was dedicated after the fashion of a templum, with the rites of inauguratio, effatio, and liberatio, as a place of peace within the pomerium, excluding connection with war and death. Even to cross to the Campus Martius required its degree of ceremony, until the imperium domi was extended. All this explains why features of the Romulus myth associate the 'inauguration' of the urbs with the conferring of imperium domi, and the auspicia of imperium militiae reflect the external relations.

The brief summary of an intricate argument can do no more than direct attention to it. Of course, the context itself is a reconstruction from the evidence, in which the original details are again set; but this is the regular method of 'working hypothesis'. Magdelain was not in time to consider J. J. Nicholls's criticism (A.J.P. 1967, 274–8) of his preliminary studies. But there is scope for further consideration from the side of Roman religion as well as the Roman constitution—providing one does not rely too much on the traditional account of the first years of the Roman Republic, because the evidence here affects that problem also.
