Digital Architecture - Results From a Gap Analysis, 2015 The digital architecture is defined as a collection of IT capabilities needed to support and integrate a wide spectrum of real time digital capabilities for nuclear power plant performance improvements The digital architecture can be thought of as an integration of the separate I C and information systems already in place in NPPs brought together for the purpose of creating new levels of automation in NPP work activities In some cases it might be an extension of the current communication systems to provide digital communications where they are currently analog only This collection of IT capabilities must in turn be based on a set of user requirements that must be supported for the interconnected technologies to operate in an integrated manner These requirements simply put are a statement of what sorts of digital work functions will be exercised in a fully implemented seamless digital environment and how much they will be used The goal of the digital architecture research is to develop a methodology for mapping nuclear power plant operational and support activities into the digital architecture which includes the development of a consensus model for advanced information and control architecture The consensus model should be developed at a level of detail that is useful to the industry In other words not so detailed that it specifies specific protocols and not so vague that it is only provides a high level description of technology The next step towards the model development is to determine the current state of digital architecture at typical NPPs To investigate the current state the researchers conducted a gap analysis to determine to what extent the NPPs can support the future digital technology environment with their existing I C and IT structure and where gaps exist with respect to the full deployment of technology over time The methodology result and conclusions from the gap analysis are described in this report
