Copper is an essential trace element found ubiquitously in humans [1,2], plants [3–5], vertebrates and invertebrates [6], and is present in different active sites at innumerable proteins and enzymes [7–11]. In such biological systems, copper enzymes perform functions such as uptake and transport of oxygen; electron transfer in the respiratory chain; catalytic oxidation or reduction of many substrates; antioxidant action; uptake, transport and storage of metal ions, etc. [12,13]. Structurally, copper compounds appear in many configurations, coordinated with simple ligands or biomolecules, in a wide range of arrangements [14]. The two common oxidation states of copper, Cu^+ and Cu^{2+} , present in biological systems exhibit peculiar properties, with a range of reactivity and nuclearity, forming mono-, bi-, poly-nuclear, or even cluster species. The proteins of copper may have one or many metal ion centers with different spectroscopic signatures and dissimilar activity [15]. On the other hand, copper ions are also involved in neurodegenerative diseases, in which their redox properties play important roles [16–22]. Considering the varying biological roles of copper described above, the development of new copper-containing coordination complexes is an intense topic of research, involving exploration of their pharmacological properties, especially their anticancer activities [23–31].

Consequently, the Bioinorganic Chemistry of copper constitutes a rich and challenging field of investigation, attracting the attention and interest of research groups around the world, as demonstrated by the huge number of files found in literature searches by using copper in combination with a second keyword, such as antibacterial, anticancer, diseases, catalysts, mimics, proteins, spectroscopy, reactivity, etc.

This diversity is clearly demonstrated in this Special Issue of Inorganics, ‘Bioinorganic Chemistry of Copper’, which contains 14 published articles that explore topics such as antiproliferative studies, anticancer agents, anti-inflammatory compounds, potential radioactive imaging diagnosis agents, reactive species related to amyloid peptides, antiparasitic activity, catalytic oxidative activity, and protein mimics.

Potential anticancer agents were reported in most of the published articles. A review about mixed chelate homoleptic or heteroleptic copper(II) complexes, known as Casiopeinas[®] and already used in clinical tests, was provided by Ruiz-Azuara and co-workers (contribution 1), describing translational medicine criteria to establish a normative process for new drug development.

Batista and coll. (contribution 2) isolated and characterized a series of $\text{Cu(I)}/\text{PPh}_3/\text{naphthoquinone}$ complexes with anticancer properties against diverse tumor cells. Their mode of action also involves reactive oxygen species (ROS) generation, both in the absence (peroxyl radicals) and presence of irradiation (hydroxyl radicals).
