This paper consists of a review of basic biofeedback research on the control of human blood pressure a presentation of the clinical studies on the application of biofeedback methods to treatment of hypertension and a summary of related clinical research on other methods of self regulation for the disorder Medical and physiological facts about the disorder and of importance to behavioral approaches are presented Practical clinical issues which complicate the application of biofeedback are discussed It is concluded that biofeedback and other behavioral procedures may provide alternative or adjunctive modalities in the treatment of high blood pressure In several studies biofeedback techniques appear to be effective in reducing pressure levels or in reducing medication requirements However the clinical research is incomplete and more comprehensive studies are needed to evaluate the long term effects and feasibility of biofeedback and other methods of behavioral and self regulation in essential hypertension

In this book I have attempted to evaluate critically the very large literature which has accumulated in the area of biofeedback over the past 10 15 years As might be expected in any area of psychology with clinical possibilities the literature divides itself into two main categories fundamental research studies and therapeutic studies It is now apparent that the clinical applications of biofeedback have far outstripped their fundamental research bases with the inevitable result that the initial wave of enthusiasm may be replaced with an unnecessarily severe skepticism Either extreme position is unjustified Biofeedback does represent an important new approach to the elucidation of the role played by internal systems in the adjustment of the organism to its environment But its potential will only be revealed if its use in practice is soundly based on fundamental research There are promising signs that this is being realized so that there is cause for optimism
