Remote Sensing of In-flight Icing Conditions Charles Curtis Ryerson, 2000 Remote sensing systems that map aircraft icing conditions in the flight path from airports or aircraft would allow icing to be avoided and exited Icing remote sensing system development requires consideration of the operational environment the meteorological environment and the technology available Operationally pilots need unambiguous cockpit icing displays for risk management decision making Human factors aircraft integration integration of remotely sensed icing information into the weather system infrastructures and avoid and exit issues need resolution An icing remote sensing system detects cloud and precipitation liquid water drop size and temperature An algorithm is needed to convert these conditions into icing potential estimates for cockpit display Specification development requires that magnitudes of cloud microphysical conditions and their spatial and temporal variability be understood at multiple scales The core of an icing remote sensing system is the technology that senses icing microphysical conditions Radar and microwave radiometers penetrate clouds and can estimate liquid water and drop size Airport based radar or radiometers are the most viable near term technologies A radiometer that profiles cloud liquid water and experimental techniques to use radiometers horizontally are promising The most critical operational research needs are to assess cockpit and aircraft system integration develop avoid and exit protocols assess human factors and integrate remote sensing information into weather and air traffic control infrastructures This report reviews operational meteorological and technological considerations in developing the capability to remotely map in flight icing conditions from the ground and from the air
