Here, There, Where? Michael P. Murray, 1982      Geographical Review, 1923      Mineral Resources Geological Survey of New South Wales, 1913      Enhanced Surface Imaging of Crustal Deformation A. John Haines, Lada L. Dimitrova, Laura M. Wallace, Charles A. Williams, 2015-08-11 This book takes an in depth look at a novel methodology for analyzing Global Positioning System GPS data to obtain the highest possible resolution surface imaging of tectonic deformation sources without prescribing the nature of either the sources or the subsurface medium GPS methods are widely used to track the surface expression of crustal deformation at tectonic plate boundaries and are typically expressed in terms of velocity fields or strain rate fields Vertical derivatives of horizontal stress VDoHS rates at the Earth's surface can also be derived from GPS velocities and VDoHS rates provide much higher resolution information about subsurface deformation sources than velocities or strain rates In particular VDoHS rates allow for high precision estimates of fault dips slip rates and locking depths as well as objective characterization of previously unknown or hidden tectonic deformation zones
