New Information Technologies and Office Employment Nicole Mandon, 1988 Based on 17 case studies in European Community countries and a literature review this research project derives several findings some of them contradictory about the evolution of qualifications related to office technology The population studied was office technology users below the executive level The project found that the impact of the new information technologies NITs is dependent on the following factors technical characteristics and possible applications the economic context that produces the objectives or expected results the organizational set up and finally an important factor the methods of human resource management and the behavior of the individual and professional groups concerned The research is organized in three chapters The first chapter shows how technology applications the context and the occupational categories have evolved since the 1960s and how the daily experience of NITs has brought about new concepts of information and changes in patterns of behavior and roles The second chapter shows how occupational activity has had to redefine its content and cope with a rearrangement of jobs especially jobs in the banking insurance and secretarial sectors The options offered by the present are highlighted in the last chapter A 177 item bibliography arranged by country is included

Gender, Expertise and Information Technology Marja Vehviläinen, 1997 Abstract This book explores the interwoven construction of gender expertise and information technology by starting from three positions of information systems development in Finland male computing pioneers autobiographical accounts women developers oral histories and an office workers study circle with related interviews and fourthly from the codes of ethics of international computing professionals associations ACM and IFIP By applying Dorothy Smith's theory of conceptual practices of power information technology is understood as textuality in which texts e.g. programs professional journals and electronic messages are produced and interpreted through people's particular practices and by using particular knowledges of information technology. Both practices and knowledges, the expertise of information technology, are organized within materially based social relations. Gender intertwines with information technology through social practices. Gender is studied on the level of social, often textually mediated, relations in terms of gendering hierarchies and divisions of labour, but also inspired by Donna Haraway at the level of subjectivity in terms of definitions of information technology made by subjects. The second major aim of this work is to participate in the development of methodologies on gender and technology research. The study pays attention to persistently male tendencies of information technology, but it looks for spaces available for women as well. The computing professions inherited strict gender hierarchies from the punched card systems of the 1950s and those were strengthened by fraternities of former army acquaintances in everyday practices of systems development in public worlds of professional journals and associations, as well as within images of identity. In this setting, the view of male experts and managers gained a status of objective truth. In the 1970s and 1980s, the ideas of flexible management and work design made space for participatory approaches towards systems design. At the same time, large numbers of women entered information technology professions in Finland. Yet that view of objective truth has not been thoroughly challenged, and there has been little room for textualities developed from women's or any other particular groups' standpoints within information technology expertise. People such as office workers can develop technologies based on their everyday life situations, and this is a real opportunity for challenging both the gendering and the expertise of technology. However, the work done in particular settings does not translate to publicly available textuality.

Gendered Practices Boel Berner, 1997. Technology has the power to shape lives, identities, and futures. Experiences of technology vary, however, between women and men. Gender profoundly influences how technology is created, used, and changed. The essays in this book discuss gendered practices in a wide range of technologies and technical milieus. Various sociotechnical arenas where definitions of masculinity and femininity are constituted, enacted, or put on display are explored: work places, schools, museums, and homes. The authors examine feminist political practices to influence technical change, as well as recent efforts to reconceptualize the relationships between gender and technology.
