Abstract: Background: Sickle cell disease (SCD) is an autosomal recessive haemoglobin disorder, affecting about 7.74 million individuals worldwide, but it is more prevalent among Africans and Asians. SCD is characterised by many complications, and it is a major health issue in Nigeria, the country with the largest burden of the disease globally. This work aims to present the design and implementation of electronic registries (ER) for SCD in a tertiary hospital in Nigeria. Methods: Registry design was initiated during a staff exchange programme within the ARISE initiative (EU grant agreement no. 824021). Ethical approval was obtained, and paper records were retrieved and transferred into one adult and one paediatric database, developed with Microsoft Access. Results: Data from 2659 SCD patients were entered in the ERs, including 698 (26.3%) adults and 1961 (73.7%) children. There were 287 (41%) male adults, 404 (58%) female and 7 (1%) patients whose gender was missing. There were 1041 (53.1%) male children, 906 (46.2%) female and 14 (0.7%) whose gender was missing. Information on phenotype was available for 2385 subjects, and most of them (2082, 87.3%) were SS. The most prevalent SCD-related complication was painful events (26.6% in adults and 68.7% in children, considering valid cases). Conclusions: About 60% of SCD patients in the centre were included in the ERs providing useful, hands-on recommendations for future ER design in SCD. These ERs might be an appropriate tool for collecting and analysing SCD patients' data.

1. Introduction

Sickle cell disease (SCD) is an autosomal recessive haemoglobin disorder, affecting about 7.74 million individuals worldwide [1]. The disease occurs worldwide but is more prevalent among Africans and Asians. SCD is characterised by many complications, including chronic pain, acute pain crises, acute chest syndrome, stroke, organ damage, an increased risk of severe infections, and reduced longevity [2]. SCD is a major health issue in Nigeria; the country has by far the largest burden of the disease globally. More than 40 million Nigerians are carriers of the sickle cell gene (Hb S), and an estimated 150,000 babies are born every year with sickle cell anaemia (Hb SS). Unfortunately, an estimated 66.7% of these babies hardly reach five years of age; they die mostly from a lack of information about the disease and lack of access to proper diagnosis and care [3].

Information technology tools such as electronic registries (ERs) in healthcare systems can improve the quality of healthcare services [4]. In addition to providing more accurate
