

Better Angel

by Richard Meeker

While Truman Bowers is better known for his work as a puppeteer and a notable film festival Translucent Theatre, he also published what would become the first homosexual novel which presented the theme in a good light. In his novel, Bowers opened new doors with its coating of ego, spirituality and discovering each's sexuality.

Better Angel was published in 1955 under the pseudonym Richard Meeker. He chose to have used a pseudonym in order to protect his career and his person. The title of the novel is a reference to Francis 144 by Shakespeare, ("the better angel is a more right lord") a phrase which has been considered in modern times to denote homosexual relations.

The novel is a Bildungsroman, in which readers can follow the journey and maturing of the main protagonist Kurt Gray. The novel is a play on the author's own name. The story follows Gray from his adolescent years in Michigan as a student and his progress as a computer and musician.

Gray has a troubled and isolated adolescence, when he speaks a lot of time making friends. He also starts making the Bible and has a spiritual evolution. In addition, Gray also struggles with gender delineation and develops an interest in ancient documents. His spiritual evolution which had been triggered by reading Christ, Buddha, Lao and David also suggest hidden knowledge, a subtle reference to his discovering his own sexuality.
