

1. The organization of collection management in academic libraries

There is no agreed usage for the terms collection development and collection management - in fact the two are used as rather loose synonyms. However, reflection would demonstrate that they do imply different concepts and some distinction is a necessary preamble to any discussion. Collection development relates to the selection and acquisition of material for an expanding collection and decisions on the material to be included in that collection. Collection management may subsume this, but also includes the allocation of the bookfund and the balance between books, journals and conservation; the disposition of stock between open and closed access, between different media and between branches of the library and stores; and, finally, the monitoring and encouragement of collection use. In sum, collection management also includes issues concerned with conservation and disposal, and is aimed more at the presentation of the collection to the user than at the collection itself. It should be clear from this wide definition of collection management that a variety of types of staff will be involved in different ways and at different times. As with all library activities there is no 'right' or 'wrong' way to manage the activity. The library must decide the importance it attaches to the management of its collections and then deploy staff and other resources in the light of local needs and opportunities.

Before considering staffing structures it is necessary to look at the activities undertaken by the library in managing its collections and at the pressures which bear on them. Some of this touches inevitably on the themes developed in other chapters. This chapter will consider the organization and staffing of the various operations within collection management, relationships with academic staff and departments, and where collection management sits as an activity within the organization and in relation to other organizations. Although the divisions are far from watertight, for ease of consideration, the activities will be considered under four heads:

- collection development;
- collection evaluation;
- stock relegation and disposal;
- staff structure.

Collection development

The growth of library collections throughout the expansionist years of the 1960s and early 1970s was spectacular and can largely be attributed to those staff called subject specialists. Libraries appointed staff, in effect as bibliographers, whose role was principally that of guiding the expansion of the collections rather than serving the needs of the majority of readers, although in some libraries there was a real attempt to marry the two activities in one individual member of staff. The end of this era was signalled by the much execrated Atkinson report,¹ but it has taken a further decade of retrenchment and staff losses before the concept of the subject specialist has been brought seriously into question again. Woodhead and Martin² conducted a survey which suggested that we may have reached (and now passed) "the high water mark of subject specialization in British university libraries". This seems more than likely to be the case. The challenges facing libraries have been changing in the last decade, and
