ABSTRACT

Organic and inorganic geochemistry was integrated with sedimentology from the Eagle Ford Group in the U.S. Geological Survey Gulf Coast-3 drill core to investigate why organic matter enrichment and anoxia predominate the Cenomanian-Turonian oceanic anoxic event (OAE-2) at the southern Western Interior Seaway (WIS). The relationship between the degree of organic matter sulfurization and preservation in the southern WIS is comparable to OAE-2 sites outside of the WIS, but enhanced organic matter sulfurization and preservation predominate OAE-2, distinguishing the southern WIS from other OAE-2 localities. Persistent euxinia and organic matter sulfurization before and during the mid-Cenomanian event (MCE) facilitated maximum organic matter enrichment and preservation to coincide with extensive lateral sediment transport. The new perspective detailed here reconciles geochemical evidence of depositional euxinia with sedimentological evidence of sediment transport, which informs how organic-rich mudstones form in dynamic environments. After the MCE but before OAE-2, reducing conditions weakened as relative sea-level continued to rise, resulting in an oxygen-depleted environment that was prone to transient euxinia. The extent of organic matter sulfurization, preservation, and enrichment declined as euxinia became intermittent. As maximum sea-level was established during OAE-2, boreal water masses flowed into the southern WIS and unrestricted, oxygenated marine conditions developed, which resulted in degradation of marine organic matter and less organic enrichment.

The highest relative contribution of marine bacterial organic matter occurred during the persistently euxinic interval before and during the MCE. The relative input of algal organic matter increased as the depositional conditions became less reducing after the MCE but before OAE-2. Prokaryotic green algae contributed to the consistent dominance of C_{29} steranes preceding OAE-2, which is becoming a widely observed feature across the southern and central WIS. A sharp drop in the C_{29} sterane relative abundance reflects a decline in the abundance of prokaryotes as oxic depositional conditions developed during OAE-2. Relative abundances of 2-methylhopanes increased during OAE-2, which is a common signature of OAEs, suggesting a modified nitrogen cycle in the offshore southern WIS despite oxic depositional conditions during OAE-2.

1. Introduction

The Cenomanian–Turonian oceanic anoxic event (OAE-2; ~94.4 Ma) is associated with marine anoxia, widespread deposition of organic-rich rocks, and a global carbon isotope excursion (CIE; Jenkyns, 1980), but OAE-2 has a markedly different expression in the Western Interior Seaway (WIS; Fig. 1). Specifically, anoxia and organic enrichment predated OAE-2, while oxygenated conditions emerged during OAE-2 (Denne et al., 2014; Eldrett et al., 2014). These observations highlight the question of what factors led to the temporal offset between organic accumulation and anoxia with respect to OAE-2 in the WIS. Previous studies have suggested that sea-level modulated the inflow of boreal and Tethys water masses into the WIS during the Cenomanian and Turonian, affecting the nutrient supply and timing of anoxia and organic matter (OM) deposition relative to OAE-2 (Denne et al., 2014; Eldrett et al., 2017, 2014).

We integrate bulk organic and inorganic geochemistry, biomarkers, kerogen elemental composition, and sedimentological observations of the Eagle Ford Group of southwest Texas to investigate factors that decoupled organic carbon burial from OAE-2 in the southern WIS. This
