shrunk whose memory was not haunted by the clank of the shackle Before daylight he had crossed the Chesil Beach the downs beyond Weymouth were reached by sunrise The wind was freshening the clouds were dispersed and looking across the east bay Doctor Dick saw Portland for the last time Turning his eye in the opposite direction he caught sight of a church tower nestling in the bosom of the downs that indicated a village nt where he might get food to satisfy the cravings of hunger which were already pinching his stomach As he plunged down the hill he could have shouted in the mad joy of escape and the prospect of gorging his appetite He was little better than a wild beast turned loose his sole restraint at this time was the dread of capture With common prudence he felt that he was pretty safe now Who would know him for an escaped convict In the rough and grimy clothes of the dead seaman he might easily pass for an ordinary tramp Passing the church he sighted the signboard of an inn down the stragglng village street What should he have for this the first free meal after two years of prison diet Eggs and bacon and a big white loaf and sweet butter brown ale oh for the taste of it but not too much lest it should upset him after his long
