
 REVISITING LOCATIONAL CONFLICT

 Michael Dear

Resolving Locational Conflicts, edited by Robert W. Lake. New Brunswick, NJ: The Center for Urban Policy Research Rutgers University, 1986. 445pp. Price: $19.95 paper.

Distributional Conflicts in Environmental Resource Policy, edited by Allan Schnaiberg, Nicholas Watts, and Klaus Zimmerman. New York, NY: St. Martin's Press, 1986. 455pp. Price: $45.00 cloth.

These two books offer quite different things to the reader. Lake's is a collection of previously published articles that provide a good summary of U.S. experience in many conflicts over the siting of relatively large-scale noxious facilities. On the other hand, the more-focused collection of original essays in Schnaiberg, Watts, and Zimmerman provides a state-of-the-art discussion on international scholarly work in conflict over environmental- and resources-conservation policy.

Bob Lake has collected 22 essays that have all been previously published in relatively accessible journals or books in the fields of planning, risk assessment, and law (among others). The book "examines the politics of conflict over the siting of major facilities . . . in order to facilitate its resolution" (p. xv). Lake issues specific disclaimers that the collection does not represent a cookbook guide to opposition activists or siting officials; nor is it a theoretical discussion on the deep-seated structural forces that lead to social conflict. Instead, in an all-too-brief introductory essay, Lake interprets locational conflict as the "inevitable emergence of unresolved political debates that have been submerged in earlier phases of policy development and facility planning" (p. xvii).

The 22 essays in this book are arranged in three sections: (1) issues, (2) process, and (3) tools. The four essays in part one examine some of the reasons why conflict arises around specific types of siting decisions. One of the most important lessons from this section is that a quick "scientific fix" will not resolve the political tensions that arise from such decisions. In part two of the book ("Process"), there are five essays that explore the procedural dimensions of siting, covering relatively familiar territory on the problems of defining the public interest, the process of participation, and so on. By far the largest section of the book (part three—"Tools") contains 13 essays essentially devoted to risk assessment, negotiation strategies, and cost-benefit/compensation analysis.

In sum, Lake's collection represents a potpourri of case studies. Policy analysts or students who need a relatively concise collection of U.S. experiences in siting major facilities—such as hazardous-waste disposal facilities, nuclear power plants, and liquified natural gas facilities—will find them useful. But there is little that is new or unexpected in this collection.

Schnaiberg, Watts, and Zimmerman (henceforth, SWZ) have collected a series of nine papers from a 1984 conference held in West Germany. The nine papers are each supplemented by substantive commentaries by conference discussants, as well as introductory and concluding chapters by Watts and Schnaiberg, respectively. The SWZ collection focuses on distributional con-
